Food Shopper

By Susan K. Simpson

A packed lunch or bag lunch is the order of the day for many an active person. And, so it should be. Lunches packed at home are sometimes more economical and more convenient than having to pay someone else to prepare that lunch for you. The trick to successful packed lunches, though, is to avoid unpleasant results from several factors, the most important being food poisoning.

Sound food preparation techniques, sensible sanitation and personal hygiene are the first steps to success. With a little thought and planning, they are not hard to master. All kitchen counter-tops and utensils should be clean. Clean from a thorough washing with soap and water. The lunch packer's hands must also be considered and must be just as clean.

The food rule – KEEP HOT foods HOT and COLD foods COLD is one of the most important guidelines of all. If there is bacteria present then, it won't have a chance to grow. How to accomplish this follows.

A vacuum bottle continues to be recognized as the best way to keep foods hot. The "wide mouth" variety, of course, is more versatile in that drinks as well as soups or stews may be kept at a safe temperature if the product is boiling when put into the bottle. So much for the vacuum jar.

Now, how to keep cold foods cold. Keep cold foods in the refrigerator until just before leaving for work. Then, ideally, if a refrigerator is available transfer on arrival.

To The Citizens Of Appomattox County

As a general rule, I do not get involved in politics, but I feel I should make an exception in this year's election for Clerk of the Circuit Court.

I have known Murrell Ferguson all his life. I hired him as a bookkeeper shortly after he returned from the service of his country in World War II. That was approximately 24 years ago, and since that time he has proven to be a dedicated, loyal and most efficient employee. I am sure that if you elect Murrell Ferguson as Clerk of the Circuit Court, he will prove to be dedicated, loyal and efficient in that important position as he has been to me and every other job he has undertaken in his church and various other civic organizations.

Dryers

ses the need for ironing and is used for all types of permanent press items from work clothes and uniforms to dresses and shirts. Some manufacturers suggest this cycle for drying most knits and man-made fibers such as nylon, acrylic, polyester and blends of these with other fibers.

The increased popularity of knitted garments in clothing and home furnishings has generated interest in a setting for these items. It may be indicated with the permanent press selection, delicate or as a separate control.

Some manufacturers provide a heavy cycle for faster drying of those occasional heavy, bulky loads - bedspreads, quilts, mattress pads, rugs and the like.

There are three basic types of control cycles available in dryers today. While designs of manufacturers may differ, the types to consider include: times control, automatic and electronic.

Timed control - the user determines the length of time the dryer will operate and sets a control dial marked in minutes. The maximum drying time varies from 60-70 minutes with some models offering up to 140 minutes. When the preset time has elasped, the dryer stops. Usually there is a cool-off period at the end when clothes are tumbled without heat to make them easier to handle or eliminate wrinkling.

Automatic - a control dial can be set for the degree of dryness preferred by the type of load being dried. The sensor portion of the control involves a timer and thermostat. Basically, the dryer operates with the heat on until the thermostat causes the heat source to cycle off. Each time the heat source turns off, the timer runs and conversely when the heat turns on the timer is off. This continues until all the time determined on the timer has run out. The user must determine the size and condition of the load. Less time, obviously, is required for lighter loads. Various methods are used to indicate automatic cycles. They may be marked into drying zones such as heavy, normal, delicate or by regular or permanent press cycle with dryness selection ranging from less to very dry.

Electronic control - an electronic sensing device combines with a thermostat to determine when clothes are dry. The control, located in the dryer drum, measures the moisture level of clothes as they tumble. It is extremely sensitive and when the degree of dryness selected has been reached, the dryer control shuts the dryer off. A cool-down also occurs at the end of the cycle.

The cycles provided may include one designed to dry fabrics for immediate use or storage; another to dry permanent press with minimum wrinkling and a third to leave enough moisture in the fabrics for ironing thus eliminating the need for dampening.

Another feature indicated on the control panel is a buzzer or signal that sounds when the load is dry. An aid for those who often open the end of the cycle is a wrinkle-prevention control. This keeps the dryer tumbling with occasional heat after the load ends and is especially helpful when drying permanent press and man-made fibers. The length of time for the setting varies with the manufacturer.
